

Feedback

Assignment Week 6, Period 1 (06-10/10-10)

Name _Michael O. Boateng_____

Date __10/10/2025_____

1. Download this document, make the assignments here under and answer the questions
2. When finished, upload your assignment on Blackboard, in your Portfolio
3. Deadline: 12-10, at 23:59

Go to this week's power point to look up some information.

1. Write an essay of minimum 500 words about the importance of feedback, including at least the following topics:
 - Why it's important to be able to give proper feedback? Involve the 21st century skills also in your essay
 - Why feedback is different from criticizing
 - Mention the ground rules for proper feedback. Do not include the BECD-method in your answer, since this is an instrument for proper feedback, not a rule
 - Describe an example of effective feedback you received in the (recent) past

Your essay:

The meaning of feedback is obvious, and it is truly a vital aspect of professional and personal development. It provides insight into how others perceive our actions, behaviors, and performance where we may excel and where we need improvement. Especially currently within educational settings and when operating as collaborative units, understanding the process of providing and receiving feedback is an increasingly important skill. Feedback fosters growth, self-awareness and enhanced communication, all highly sought-after components of success in today's world.

The ability to provide quality feedback is instrumental when working with others. Whether in school or the workplace, success is dependent upon clear articulation and mutual understanding. Ideally, feedback increases performance and group dynamic as it allows individuals to reflect upon their efforts to implement tangible change. This directly relates to skills of interpersonal communication, collaboration, critical thinking and self-regulation. For example, to provide feedback, one must observe carefully, reflect on a desired response and articulate findings in a constructively understandable and respectful manner. Similarly, receiving feedback requires self-awareness and openness to reformation to apply suggestions for improvement. These are vital skills needed for success in an ever-changing technologically driven world.

It is important to know that feedback is not just the same thing as criticism. Criticism is often emotional and focused on what is wrong; that can make people feel bad or not want to try. Feedback, though, is a type of constructive idea and focuses on making things better. The feedback is given to help, not to hurt. The Week 6 presentation said it well: criticism is a quick and destructive thing, while feedback is when you really think about being helpful. Saying "Your report is bad," is criticism, but saying "Your report could be easier to understand if you added more examples" is feedback. The difference is in how you do it. Feedback is about helping someone get better, while criticism just points out what they did wrong.

Given feedback, there are some rules you should follow. The feedback should be descriptive always, not judgmental. This means you should talk about what you saw, not just put a label on the person. And it should be specific; do not say things like "always" or "never." The feedback should also be something they can use, focusing on things the person can change. It's more helpful when the person wants to hear it. Timing is also key, so give feedback soon after it happens, not weeks later. It should also be clear and precise, so it is easy to understand, and factual, based on what really happened, not what you think happened. If you follow these rules, feedback can really help people grow, instead of causing problems.

A personal example that comes to mind, of good feedback I got, was during a group presentation last year. After we practiced the first time, my teammate said that I was talking too fast and that it was hard for people to follow me. They explained that if I slowed down, the audience would get the main points better. At first, I felt a little foolish, but then I realized that they were right, and they were just trying to help. The next time we practiced, I talked more slowly and clearly. The result was much better, the teacher even said that our presentation was easier to follow. This taught me that good feedback is not meant to hurt your feelings; it's supposed to help you improve.

In conclusion, feedback is a big part of learning, working as a team, and growing as a person. It helps us think about things, makes our communication better, and helps us do better overall. The feedback, when given the right way and using clear rules, builds trust and helps us make positive changes. Not like criticism, feedback is all about behavior and solutions, not about judging people. Learning how to give and get feedback well is a super vital skill that helps us do well in school and at work.

--

2. Feedback. Write for minimum 3 of your team members a Tip and a Top according to the BECD-method. Sit down with your team and coordinate, thus making sure that each team member will receive feedback.
3. Upload your received feedback in your portfolio on Blackboard